'an infinite sphere, whose centre is everywhere and whose circumference is nowhere'

While boundlessness is a characteristic of the empyrean, bounds are the defining characteristic of our reality. Not only the bounds we draw in the world, separating one thing from another, but the boundaries we draw within ourselves.

What belongs here, what must be ejected outside the circle of our self? What remains inside the circle is us, what is outside the circle is 'the other'.

The sword and the dagger have symbolized the ability of reason to divide the world into ever decreasing parts within the mystic traditions. If the cut is suggestive of division, is the rubbing out of the line a healing, by making something whole again?

The question Daniel has chosen to address is where to place the cut, and how it affects us. How and where people divide themselves from the world comes to define how we interact with what remains outside our bounds.
