Before it was called that, this was called London. Art. We get it., aping our letting agent's motto, London. Property. We get it. This letting agent - who gets it, gets everything - would they get the irony? We wouldn't want to risk giving it away. That's why we're going in dead-earnest. Beware of no irony above all, guarding no secret, opening to a plastered wall. Let's take inventory of what there is, actually, in the house in London that we all used to share. All the art there is in the house. One, tate poster of franz west big squiggly metal sculpture, above toilet, two, kunstverein münchen poster of tony cokes slide IMAGE IS EVERYTHING opposite toilet, three, small clay sculpture by noa, wall-mounted, kitchen, four, ruth angel edwards painting depicting sexy oat milk girl wearing ray bans being space-invaded by quaker oats man, taken down by friend who was subletting, then put back, I just learned, five, second small clay sculpture, recent gift from noa, I'm actually hoping to move out soon so not yet mounted, sorry, six, A0 poster 'photo study of old man' by felix riemann, also gift, hangs elegantly from nail and red binder clip, seven to nine, crayon and watercolour works by 54 the gate, bought at auction, ten, A3 poster by sarah cameron framing a missoni-like leather jacket, label reads MISSION however, eleven, on the door to the cupboard of shame, two page note from downstairs neighbour re: the recycling bin, mounted one page sellotaped over the other, like surprise, it's multiple pages, I need a lot of space, twelve, cache of inkjet prints by stanislav, behind the desk, too close to the radiator, thirteen, in the same cache, A3 poster depicting lawnchair facing the wall by sanna helena berger, fourteen, liz magor poster in stylish frame, corridor, origin unknown, fifteen, poster by trisha donelly, who is particularly well known as a conceptual artist, yet not shy about wall-based work, sixteen, brief note from other neighbour: "how dare you label OUR buzzer with YOUR flat number - NOT FUNNY" ok well.
